Poetry 167

The Leper

Gregory Brooks

An armadillo dug up the grass in my parents' yard last year—the kind that bounce buckshot off their back and carry leprosy.

If only I could do the same: materialize armor, lumber along.

I could curl up while testimonies pelt my spine on Sunday, doubts doubting doubt. Everything in a simmer until I find my niche at church. Someplace to read history and hide.

Healing happens in the dark for those of us who burrow.